Here they come: A day to remember
© Commonwealth of Australia 2016

This work is copyright.

Permission is given by the Commonwealth for this publication to be copied royalty free within Australia solely for educational purposes. Apart from any use as permitted under the Copyright Act 1968, no part may be reproduced for commercial purposes.

To the best of DVA’s knowledge, copyright permission has been obtained for any non-Commonwealth material used in this book and for the use of such material for education purposes. The Commonwealth shall not be responsible for any actions resulting from any errors or omissions contained in this book. If you believe there has been an error or omission in any of the material, please contact DVA at education@dva.gov.au.

A list of the photographs and objects featured in this publication is available at www.anzacportal.dva.gov.au.

Education activities designed to support this publication are available at www.anzacportal.dva.gov.au.

For enquiries about reproduction or other uses of this publication, contact:

Department of Veterans’ Affairs
Commemorations Branch
GPO Box 9998
CANBERRA ACT 2601
Tel: (02) 6289 1111
Website: www.anzacportal.dva.gov.au
Email: education@dva.gov.au
ISBN: 978-0-9944775-1-4
P03040

Published by the Department of Veterans’ Affairs
Concept development by Merrillee Chignell
Written by Jennet Cole-Adams and Judy Gauld
Illustrated by Warren Brown
Designed by Brett Hatherly, Foxfield Creative

Acknowledgements
We would like to thank the following individuals for their generous support: Derek Holyoake, Adrian Roberts, Stephen Chignell, Warren Brown, Brett Hatherly, Peter Chignell.

January 2016
Here they come
A day to remember
'I still can’t see anything, Dad,’ complained Wil.

He wondered what he was doing here. He wondered what everyone was doing here.
Wil knew today was about remembering war. But that seemed strange to him. Why would anyone want to think about something so sad? He didn’t even understand why we had wars.

’Here they come,’ said Dad as he lifted Wil onto his shoulders. ’Can you see them marching?’
Caitlin’s feet moved to the beat of the booming drum. Smiling, she glanced across at all the people who had come to watch – to thank her and the others for their service.
Her time in Afghanistan had been tough. The dangers were real. Being alert and well trained had helped keep her safe.

She was proud to be marching here today.
Roslyn looked at the marchers, old and young, as they took their seats. She wished her father was still here to take his place. Anzac Day was a day she had shared with him since she was a young girl.
Yet she didn’t feel lonely. Not in this crowd. She was one of many who had come together today to reflect. She was part of this community.
‘We must never forget them,’ said the girl at the microphone.

Col fingered the photo in his pocket. He didn’t need to take it out. He knew every detail of the young face at Nui Dat – the half smile and scattering of freckles.

Col could never forget. Even when he tried.
But he wondered what the point of remembering was if we didn’t learn from the past. People were still going to war. Brothers, like his, were still dying.

Col felt the weight of his own medals against his chest. He closed his eyes.
He looked around at the crowd and thought of his family in Sudan. He wished they were here too. There was still no peace for them.
As the sound of the bugle faded, Libby tightened her grip on Ellie’s fingers. The minute of silence began.

This part of the ceremony was always hard. Thoughts of Luke crowded her mind. Luke in his uniform, Luke at the beach, Luke cradling their baby girl.
Libby took a deep breath. She was proud of Luke. He loved being an army officer and he died serving his country. It was hard without him.
As the crowd moved away, Rose paused at the memorial – ‘The Great War’, it said. So many names. Most of the men were not much older than her when they went to war.

Life was so different for Rose and her friends – school, parties, holidays.
She reached out and touched one of the names. BANNER A. C. She wondered where he had fought. What had he seen? How had he felt? Who had he left behind?

‘Thanks,’ she whispered.
'Another Anzac Day,' said Bert. ‘We’ve done a few of these.’

Only the two of them had made it this year but Bert loved catching up with Stan. They had shared so much at Kokoda – stories, fear, exhaustion. There were things they had been through that no one else could understand. Not even their families.

But there was laughter too.

‘Remember when the wild pig came into your tent?’ smiled Bert. ‘I’ve never seen anyone run as fast as you did.’

‘Yeah, that’d be right,’ said Stan. ‘It’s a shame these old legs aren’t up to that any more.’

Bert offered his old friend another biscuit, and hoped they’d be together again next Anzac Day.
It was a day to remember.